Raketa's newest model, the Amphibia, is the latest version of watches the brand has made for sailors, submariners and divers for the last half century.

The edition released this week, coinciding with watch industry's most important week of the year, is for divers.

Made from stainless steel, the piece is capable of withstanding pressures at up to 200m with a screw-in crown securing the movement from any water.

The watch also features a unidirectional bezel.

This offers a 15-minute scale and luminescent indexes, producing clear clicking sound for error-free adjustment with no risk of accidental misalignment.

Designers have implemented a high-contrast dial with large indexes and hands, ensuring an easy-to-read face to enhance dive control.

The luminescent coating ensures a bright and long-lasting glow while at greater depths, where visibility is often low and light conditions vary, orange stands out more effectively.

A brightly colored silicone strap is deployed for comfort in aquatic environments.

At the heart of the Amphibia is its automatic movement, manufactured from start to finish at the Raketa Watch Factory in St. Petersburg.

The movement's rotor is adorned with an image of a mermaid designed in the style of illustrations from Russian fairy tales.

The cost is €2200 including VAT.
